What we can learn from revisions in authentic learner texts

This talk explores to what extent methods of writing process analysis, here: the analysis of revisions, can be fruitfully applied to learner corpus data, more specifically to data drawn from the Marburg Corpus of Intermediate Learner English (MILE). Based on the findings of an analysis of 598 instances of revisions, it is argued that corpus-based revision analysis provides us with new and interesting ways of exploring (the development of) interlanguage.
